

Fossil evidence from an African rift valley may explain the rapid proliferation of plants and animals on the continent during an era of widespread and rapid continental breakup, catastrophic volcano activity, and other environmental threats to life, according to Lab research. A theory advanced by a Lab researcher proposes that fortuitous characteristics of Africa's geographical position during this era may account for this otherwise surprising fact.

Geology sheds light on proliferation of life in Africa amid environmental threats